2 TO 2 MILLION PETITION

I SUPPORT EFFORTS TO BRING OUT
THE BEST IN OUR CHILDREN BY MAKING THE SCHOOL FOOD ENVIRONMENT A PRIORITY IN OUR SCHOOL DISTRICT.

In an effort to show how many of us care about getting the junk out and real food into our schools, we've created this simple petition that can be signed online or downloaded for circulation at local events. You can print it, collect names and then fax it back to us. It's also a great way to form a local email chain.

The goal is to get two million "angry moms" actively engaged in making excellence in school food the norm in America.

This newsletter goes out to leaders across the country
who can make that happen - so please pass the petition around via email to everyone on your mailing list. Ask them to reply to you and forward the emails to us at:
lauren@angrymoms.org

And please consider hosting a house party or school district screening this fall. The new HOUSE PARTY license cost as little as $60 and is for parents, chiropractors, health counselors, wellness groups and other small community groups who wish to hold screenings of up to 30 people.

List your event for free on BraveNewTheaters to receive a $50 discount coupon. You can list your screening as "open to the public" or "private invitation only".

ROCK STARS

It used to be that a career in food service had decidedly unglamorous connotations. With the rise of celebrity chefs in the 1980's, all that changed. And with superstars like Alice Waters (The Edible Schoolyard) and Jamie Oliver (Feed Me Better) using their status to advocate for better food in schools, we've now got a new generation of celebrities: School Chefs.

It's one thing to create gourmet delights for diners with deep pockets - quite another creative feat to dish up delicious home cooked fare for fussy forth-graders on a public school budget!!

The Renegade Lunch Lady, Ann Cooper, started the trend; here's hat's off to two more:
