- 1) Can two "fed-up" moms get better food into schools across America? In the face of a national child health crisis, the documentary Two Angry Moms addresses an issue of great concern to parents across the country. What are our children eating in school, who is determining that and how is it impacting their health? While angry mom Dr. Susan Rubin speaks out in Washington and organizes parents in her district, filmmaker Amy Kalafa crosses the country in search of solutions to the many obstacles in their path. If you would like to see what they discovered along the way and maybe make some changes in your own community, be sure to join "screening specifics i.e. who, what, when, where".
 - 2) It was Texas Agriculture Secretary Susan Coombs who said that it will take two million angry moms to change the school lunch program. Dr. Susan Rubin and filmmaker Amy Kalafa signed on to be the first of those with the making of the documentary film Two Angry Moms. The film asks the question: What happens when two fed-up moms try to change school food? If you would like learn the answer to that question, join "Screening specifics i.e. who, what, when, where".
 - 3) There are nearly seventy-three million school-aged children in America and for many of them school food represents the largest portion of their daily meals. With the documentary film Two Angry Moms, filmmaker Amy Kalafa and angry mom Dr. Susan Rubin ask the question: What happens when two fed-up moms try to change school food? Part expose, part call to action, the film explores the roles of the federal government, corporate interest, school administration and parents in the feeding of our country's school kids. It offers successful and often inspirational examples of how to improve school food programs and make a difference in both the health of each child and the long-term health of the country. If you would like to see the film join "screening specifics i.e. who, what, when, where".
